

ASPHER and EUPHA thank the public health community

18 March 2022

The World has now bypassed two years since the World Health Organization (WHO) raised the alarm on COVID-19 as a public health emergency of international concern (PHEIC)¹ and later characterized it as a pandemic.²

ASPHER and EUPHA would like to express our gratitude to everyone in the public health community who tirelessly committed time and energy to combat COVID-19 lessening its impact on the population and saving innumerable lives.

The pandemic has thrown challenge after challenge and wave after wave into our paths and the public health community has responded with agility and commitment to find the best evidence-based ways forward – often under difficult circumstances and in negotiation with government, political and local actors. While at the same time, never losing sight of the broader implications of how the pandemic has impacted vulnerable populations and other ongoing health and planetary concerns.

The pandemic has not ended and it has already left a legacy of worsening health inequalities, long-COVID, and neglect of other serious conditions. The skills and expertise of public health professionals will be required to face these difficult problems and we trust that you will be ready to do what you do best to shine a light on them, leading the way to transcend boundaries and reach for solutions.

We reiterate here, what we said in the ASPHER-EUPHA joint statement last year: 'Moving forward, it is of utmost importance that public health is strengthened at its core, to ensure that it can respond to pandemics and other potential future health threats.'³ The work of public health is ongoing and we must ensure sufficient capacity to allow the time and space for public health professionals to tend to your own personal wellbeing so you may go on to meet tomorrow's challenges for the health of the public.
