

EUPHA statement: standing up for the vulnerable 18 December 2019

Sophie Beau, co-founder of the European Civil Rescue Association SOS Méditerranée, France, issued a powerful call to action during the opening ceremony of the 12th European Public Health Conference in Marseille, France, held 21 November 2019. Speaking to over 2,300 public health professionals from across Europe, she gave voice to those who lived and died as they migrated across the Mediterranean Sea.

Sophie's message was unequivocal: people are dying in the Mediterranean Sea and our governments are allowing this to happen. The graphic and shocking scenes she presented, using photographs taken during the operations of SOS Méditerranée, showed the desperate faces of migrants, some pulled from the sea and others suffering from thirst and hunger as they drifted in leaking, overcrowded vessels.

Sophie's compelling speech is a testimony to the capacity of European citizens to mobilise in a crisis. She reminded us of their commitment to solidarity, but also the importance of mobilising it at a time when people face so many challenges in their lives. Her speech exemplified the conference theme 'building bridges for solidarity and public health', underlining how bridges can be built to overcome differences.

Facts on the rescues conducted by SOS Méditerranée<sup>1</sup>:

- Since September 2019, SOS Méditerranée has assisted 29,963 refugees in distress;
- 85% were men;
- One-third of the rescued were minors, most of them unaccompanied.
- The new rescue ship the Ocean Viking has saved 1,211 people from drowning (since August 2019).

The Mediterranean cannot continue to be the site of almost 40% of migrant deaths worldwide.<sup>2</sup>
